Euthanasia

INTRODUCTION

Euthanasia, the deliberate act of ending a person's life to relieve suffering, is a complex and controversial topic that elicits varied responses across different religious traditions. This article explores the attitudes and judgments regarding euthanasia in some of the major world religions, shedding light on the diverse perspectives that shape ethical considerations.

CHRISTIANITY

Catholism

The Roman Catholic church does not accept that human beings have a right to die. Human beings are free agents, but their freedom does not extend to the ending of their own lives. Euthanasia and suicide are both a rejection of God's absolute sovereignty over life and death. Christians are mostly against euthanasia. The arguments are usually based on the beliefs that life is given by God, and that human beings are made in God's image. Some churches also emphasise the importance of not interfering with the natural process of death. The process of dying is spiritually important, and should not be disrupted.

CHRISTIANITY

In Christianity some churches think it is wrong to interfere with the process of dying, as this would interrupt the process of spirit moving towards God. Some features of Christianity suggest that there are some obligations that go against the general view that euthanasia is a bad thing: Christianity requires us to respect human beings. If we respect a person we should respect their decisions about the end of their life. We should accept their rational decisions to refuse burdensome and futile treatment.

CHRISTIANITY

The church believes that each human life is a manifestation of God in the world, a sign of his presence, a trace of his glory.

"The life which God offers to man is a gift by which God shares something of himself with his creature."

A human being who insists that they have the 'right to die' is denying the truth of their fundamental relationship with God.

HINDUISM

HINDUISM

Hinduism includes a wide range of beliefs, and opinions on euthanasia may vary. The concept of ahimsa (non-violence) is fundamental, but some Hindu scholars argue that in cases of unbearable suffering from illnesses, the act of hastening death may be a compassionate choice.

By helping to end a painful life a person is performing a good deed and so fulfilling their moral obligations.

There are 2 various Hindu views on euthanasia. Some of them think that a doctor shouldn't accept the patient's request for euthanasia.

However some Hindus believe to end painful life is good action.
